Scholarship

Faculty in the Department of History continue to be very productive in their scholarly pursuits, a record of accomplishment and promise that grows annually. During the 2010/11 academic year, faculty published two books, eleven articles/essays/book chapters, and eight book reviews. Another four articles or book chapters and one book are “forthcoming,” each with a stated date of publication provided by the publisher, another ten articles/essays/book chapters and three books are under contract or tentative contract for publication, and numerous scholarly projects are currently under review, in progress, and in their formative stage of development. Moreover, at least thirty papers were presented at conference during the year by department faculty. Making this level of productivity all the more impressive is the heavy teaching load and service obligations each faculty member carries, the limited resources locally for scholarly research, and the equally limited funds to support travel costs for research.
